A DILEMMA.

My ideal girl has golden bair. A downcast glance, a modest air. Her eyes are blue and sweet and shy: She knows as guile nor coquetry.

Her maiden heart, her soul serene. in all her words and looks are seen the more I think of her, the more All her perfections I'd adore

The witch who has me in her net, Whose dusky hair, whose saucy smile And gay caprice my heart beguild

She has each fault which I abhor. She's not the girl I'm locking for.
Alasi she more I disapprove—
The more I frown, the more I love!

HER LOVE LETTERS.

Jeanie Campbell came back from the tailor's shop where she worked and found a company of boys and girls congregated round the doorstep of the tall tenement house in which she rented one small back room. They were hooting and jesting at a man seated in his shirt sleeves on the doorstep placidly smoking a huge German porcelain pipe. The man did not seem in the least disturbed at their jeers and shrieks, but smoked on with his eyes fixed upon the one strip of sunset sky visible above the grimy roofs. Jeanie pushed her way in.

"What's the matter?" "Yah, Datchy! I'n't 'e a bloomin soft? Give a boy a shillin to go and fetch '1.. somethin to eat and is w'itin 'ere for 'm! I'n't 'e a style? Wonder 'ow long he'll w'ite!"

"Who is he?" "A blooming Dutchy! 'E carn't speak no English, 'e carn't-'as to mike signs-and nobody 'ere carn't speak nothink else. I'n't 'e a softy?" The girl paused and looked at the There was something in his patient attitude that aroused her pity. Some softer remembrance of the days before she came to this great, wicked London came over her. The man's eyes, so blue, clear and bright, and the healthy tinge of his wholesome face smote apon her with a pang of recollection of the honest Scottish faces she had left with contempt for their content when she had started forth to see life in London.

She went up to the man and signed to him to follow her indoors. She tried to make him understand that he had been robbed. The soft, gentle tones that answered her were quite unintelligible. He smiled, shrugged his shoulders, spread his bands and looked at her with that calm trustfulness one sees in dogs and children.

She smiled, nodded, pointed up the stairs and then ran out of the house. She returned with a loaf of bread and a half pound of sausages for him and roll for herself. She would make that do. He was a stranger, alone and friendless.

She put the things in his hand, pointing down the street as if to indicate that she had brought the things from the boy. He seemed to understand, took her hand and raised it to his lips. The action was so simple, so grateful that she felt ashamed and ran up the stairs to her own room.

Her comfortless breakfast of a dry roll the next morning made her a little regretful of her charity the night before. "He must shift for himself, as I have had to do," the thought, and she went out to her day's work.

When she returned in the evening, she found kim standing outside his in another train. door. He bowed and smiled, opened his door and showed his various purchases on his table. He had evidently found his way round to shops. She went up the stairs, feeling the least little bit disappointed that he did not require her help any more. He seemed different from the jaded, vulgar men and women she came in contact with in her city life. The air of the fields seemed to cling to him still. She thought as she toiled up the weary stairs how sweet the country must be looking now. Was the sun shining on the hills at home and making the waters of the lock sparkle, the bonny hills that she would never see again? Friends were dead, and to a tailoress at 12 shillings a week it was indeed a far cry to Lock Awe.

Something was on her table, a little sketch of a sweep of wide hills, with fir forests clinging to their sides, a little cluster of houses with wide overhanging roofs and shutters to the windows A figure was standing in the doorway of one of the houses.

"That is his house," said Jeanie to berself. "What a funny thing to do, to give me a picture of it! I wish I could send him back one of Loch Awe and our house up on the braes."

The next day was Sunday. She usually passed the morning in bed, tired ont with her week's work. When she came down about the middle of the day, she met him coming in, evidently in his Sunday best. Could he have been to church? Well, it was clear he had not learned the manners of Eureka court

That same hair was in papers nowshe blushed as she recalled the facther hands were grimy, her face unwashed. His eyes noted it.

They did not meet again during the week, but next Sunday morning found Jeanie with her hair out of papers and her hands washed. She was loitering at the street corner when he came back in his spruce clothes. She gave him a pert nod. She felt annoyed with him for some unknown reason and that evening made herself as resplendent as possible in her cheap, gaudy finery.

"He shall see that I can be smart, too," she thought, and tossed her head as he appeared. He stopped, and drawing a notebook from his pocket rapidly sketched a church front upon it. She shook her head. He looked puzzled. Then his quick fingers drew the outside of one of the commonest type of meeting house. She shook her head again and moved off. Somehow she did not like to show him how she spent her Sunday evenings. The weather became very hot. Jeanie drooped more and more in the unhealthy workroom and stuffy streets. He seemed to notice it, fer on one Saturday night she found a drawing of trees and a noth and figures walking about, and underneath the figures 2:30. Could be be asking her to go for a walk? She waited in to see. At 2:30 a knock came at her door. There be was, with his square, ugly, good natured face smiling at her. She felt awkward going down the stairs with him. What could they do during a whole walk if neither could speak to the other?

But that walk did not take place. The smart tie around her neck had been the price of her dinner. She turned faint and reeled, then sat down on the stairs and barst into tears.

She hardly knew if she was vexed or pleased to find herself picked up like a baby and carried up to her own room and laid upon her bed. She sat up and drank some water, while he stood looking perplexedly at her, and she blushed that he should see her untidy, disorderly room.

He went out. In a few minutes she heard her door open and something pushed along the floor. It was a little jug of het coffee and milk and a plate of German rolls. The next day another picture was left. It represented a large workshop, with men sitting at tables, all busily engaged over some mechanical work. Underneath was written the figures 30 shillings. With unskillful fingers she drew an outline of a coat and waistcoat and a needle and thread and posted it at his door as she went out, but she had to come back again, she was so ill, and all day she lay there alone waiting for what was the only friendly signal in the world to her-the scrap of paper of the foreign artist.

She heard it pushed under the door at last and feebly rose and groped for it. Her head was throbbing so that she could scarcely see that it contained a whole line of portraits—an elderly man and woman and younger faces, among which was his own, his family doubtless, She made a rough ontline of her hat, with a sharp oval for a face underneath. She was too ill to get it down to him. She pushed it out and trusted that he would fetch it. She heard him in the morning come up again, and then she heard no more, for the fever seized upon her, and when next she woke to consciousness she was lying on a hospital bed. For days she was too weak to speak or think, but when she was able one of the nurses asked her if she would like to see some papers which had been brought to the hospital for her, and the nurse spread them out before her.

The first was of a man following a stretcher through the streets, then the same man sitting alone in a solitary room with his head bowed upon his hand and weeping; the next, the same man at a door, evidently asking questions of a porter within; the next, the man was beside a bed on which lay a deathlike

"Has he been to see me?" "Yes; it was when we thought you were dying he came every day, but we could not tell him anything. No one could speak his language, but at last we found it was Wendish, from the borders of Saxony and Bohemia, and one of the doctors here got him a book in it by which he could study English. You will see by the sketches.'

The next one represented the man with the book in his hand. The next showed the man in a train, and then on board a steamer, and then

Jeanie dropped the papers "He is gone!" she said, with a little weak cry. "Oh, why have I got any better?"

"There is another picture," said the nurse, and she unrolled it for the trembling girl. The man had arrived at the little village Jeanie remembered in the first sketch: then the interior of a house was room; an old woman, two girls and three men knelt around it. "His father is dead," said Jeanie. And she turned to the next. The man was at the hospital door.

"Oh, he is coming back!" she cried. "See, this is the last," said the nurse, and as she held it up she laughed. It was the man on one knee before a girl Jeanie in her outrageous hat-but there was in a little sketch up in the right hand corner, as if it was yet in the distance, the same little village with the pine forests around, the two figures the man and Jeanie-walking arm in arm up the village street. The purse held her sides for laughing. "It's the funnicst thing I ever saw in my life!" she said. Jeanie gathered her papers together with some dignity. "I don't call it funny," she said, "I -think it was just the nicest thing that ever was done to any girl."

"My loofe!" said a voice at her side. And there was the man. Jeanie gave a little cry.

"My loofe!" said the man again. "It is my first English to you, and it will be my last. My loote!" And Jeanie, with all the dreams of her girlhood back upon her, put her arms round his neck, and sobbing said, "And I don't even know your name, but I don't care for anything in the world but you."-New York Tribune.

It was no less a feat than the climbing of Mount Tacoma, shown; a coffin lay in the middle of the in Washington, some 50 miles to the north-east of Puget sound, in the Cascade range. It was a formidable undertaking. In more than 40 years since the county was settled no woman had ever attempted it, and only a few men had accomplished it, while many had failed. The mountain is s grim one, towering 14,444 feet high, and with glaciers extending far up from its base. It is said by many experienced mountaineers to be the most difficult of all American mountains to climb. The plucky lady was willing to attempt it. The Key E. C. Smith, R. R. Parish and W. O. Amsden were with her, and Leonard Longmire.

a guide of Yelm, undertook to pilot them. The ascent of the first 7,000 feet was made on horseback, amid dense forests and over dangerous streams, and partly through natural parks, known as the Lower Gardens of Eden. This took four days. Then it got so rough and wild they had to take it afoot. It was perilous in the ex-treme. At 12,000 feet the wind blew a hurricane over the snow and blue green placier. Several crevasses had to be crossed, some of which were large enough to drop a house into,

When the summit was reached, it was found to be about two miles across. Standing on the top, the adventurous climbers could see below them two large craters, looking like immense bowls, with a central, common rim. The big crater was three-fourths of a mile across. Both were filled with snow and ice, with the rim around the bare rocks rising in places 60 feet. The steam kept the rocks bare. Coming down from the summit, where they could hardly stand, because of the fierce wind they took shelter in the crater and examined the steam jets. These looked like a row of boiling teakettles along the ridge. The party sat on the rocks and were soon damp with the moisture and parboiled by the heat, and it was as obligatory as ever to move on again.

"On the eastern edge of the big crater," said Miss Fuller, "we entered an ice cave between the snow and the rim of the crater, and there, with steam beside us, we spread our blankets, which seemed light enough now, took off our shoes, bathed our feet in whisky and began the night. After having reached the summit I began to feel sick from cold, exhaustion and the sulphur odor, and for some time suffered from a chill and nausea. Some of the gen-tlemen were tired and very cold. Eating had no attraction for me, but some ate a little. Mr. Smith melted some ice in a cup over the steam and made some beef tea from extract of beef.

"Two blankets over us seemed little protection. Through the small opening in the cave we could watch the stars and meteors and hear the awful avalanches roaring down the mountain sides. I was the only one who could sleep. When we woke, our shoes were frozen stiff and had to be thawed out in the steam. The blankets were icy."

It was more perilous going down than up. Miss Fuller's exposure caused her lips, nose and face to swell badly, and the skin peeled off, but she feels well repaid by the trip.—San Francisco Chronicle.
